A playwright who has has to cater to a popular star must be a very unhappy individual. There must be moments of acute anguish. I have had the pleasure of meeting many of the most successful playwrights, and they have all told me the same thing-their acute desire to cut themselves always from managerial plans, and the necessities of stars.

Crane did some very good work as Lawton. and also some very bad work. The good came in with his usual airy, jaunty, joking demeanor; the bad made its appearance when he sought after higher effects.
